Improved method for the rapid separation and identification of urinary steroids by high-pressure liquid chromatography-electrospray mass spectrometry. An improved method for the separation and identification of urinary steroids based on high-pressure liquid chromatography (HPLC) coupled with electrospray mass spectrometry (ESI-MS) has been developed. We have been able to separate the metabolites of the steroid hormones 6-alpha-methyl-19-nortestosterone, 17alpha-methyl-estradiol, and progesterone which are not completely resolved by reversed phase HPLC. The method involves the addition of hydrochloric acid to the urine to reduce the concentrations of strongly retained ions derived from the salts of the major urinary metabolites of the adrenal steroid hormones androgens and estrogens. This step greatly facilitates the identification of the uroconjugated metabolites of the estrogen and progesterone and improves the yield of these metabolites.

(London) – Judges should be given financial incentives to rule more quickly when prisoners challenge the conditions of their confinement, a new report from the Equal Justice Initiative, a human rights organization, finds. “If there were financial rewards for prompt and certain rulings and for speedy discharges from prisons, there would be better chances of rectifying injustices in the first place,” says Shauna Lee, a senior policy researcher at the Equal Justice Initiative and author of the report. “Judges have to be given incentives to do their work and ensure the rights of prisoners to be released with their freedom and dignity intact.” Currently, judges face no financial incentives for prompt rulings or for discharging prisoners without delay. The report, which is based on interviews with judges and official documents, notes that courts are bound by federal and state statutes that make it difficult to define a point at which a decision becomes “prompt.” Furthermore, the rules of court security and public safety constrain judges’ ability to quickly rule and discharge prisoners to protect the safety of court officers, court staff, and prisoners. The new report recommends providing judges with statutory authority to rule quickly and on a timely basis. It also recommends providing judges with an additional level of protection for court officers. The Equal Justice Initiative began publishing the Jail Time project in 2012, which compiles information on the amount of time that prisoners in more than 50 US states have to serve before completing their sentences. Its latest report is based on
